

Remembrance

This brief single-page document is in memory of Prof. Alessandro Bianchi, who died a few months ago. I had the opportunity to collaborate with him as a graduating student in my bachelor degree in Computer Science and Digital Communication and in the Master's degree in Computer Science. Later I collaborated with him in the non-profit continuation and extension of previous thesis work, coming to publish a scientific article in September 2018 and, subsequently, collaborating for a posthumous and never published major work. It is thanks to him that I became passionate about the world of research, so much so that I could hardly manage to do without it. I thank him for the many inspiring discussions aimed at achieving a common goal, and sometimes at odds with how to achieve it. According to me he represents a model teacher to follow, because he put passion into it and sometimes even a strong criticisms.

My possible future works will always have a scientific foundation directly attributable to the past years...You were right, it's never too late to change the world.
